After Abdication
Kristensen, Peter Marcus

Published in:
Chinese Political Science Review

DOI:
10.1007/s41111-017-0078-7

Publication date:
2017

Document version
Early version, also known as pre-print

Citation for published version (APA):
After Abdication: America Debates the Future of Global Leadership

Peter Marcus Kristensen
University of Copenhagen

Abstract

American observers of international affairs are currently enmeshed in a debate on the future of global order and leadership. For at least a decade, it has been debated whether the global center of power and leadership is gradually shifting away from the ‘declining’ West towards ‘rising’ powers like the BRICS and what consequences this may have for global order, governance and leadership. This paper examines this ongoing debate on the future of global leadership among American observers of international affairs. It finds two main changes in this discourse. First, with the election of President Trump and Brexit – and the resulting uncertainties over the future of NATO, the EU, free trade and climate agreements – there is now a more urgent sense that we are not only witnessing the rise of new powers but the decline of the so-called ‘liberal international order’ installed after World War II. Second, and most remarkably, the order is collapsing by way of abdication rather than a hegemonic clash between rising and declining powers. Third, and as a consequence, the discourse on a global leadership vacuum, turmoil and world disorder is gaining prominence. The paper argues that diagnoses of the coming of a ‘leaderless’ or ‘G-Zero’ world are never only neutral observations of world politics, but also political moves. As such, the narrative of a leadership vacuum can be deployed politically to, variously, call for multilateral engagement, global governance, stronger unilateral leadership, containing aspiring leaders and so on. Moreover, the various diagnoses and prescriptions for a leadership vacuum embody more or less explicit notions of what (good) leadership is and it sees ‘the world to be lead’ from a distinct perspective. By examining these contemporary debates on global leadership among American intellectuals and policymakers, it sheds light on the broader politics of ‘declinism’ and a ‘leaderless world’.

Keywords: Liberal International Order, United States, Abdication, China, Leadership

Bio: Peter Marcus Kristensen is Associate Professor at the Department of Political Science, University of Copenhagen. His research interests include the sociology of the International Relations discipline, non-Western perspectives and theories on international relations, and theories on rising powers and peaceful change.

Contact: Department of Political Science, University of Copenhagen, Øster Farimagsgade 5a, 1353, Copenhagen K, Denmark. Email: pmk@ifs.ku.dk
After Abdication: The Discourse on a Leaderless World

A sense that world politics has entered a stage of chaos, disorder and lack of global leadership is currently on the rise among American observers of international affairs. Whether this new era is dubbed a new “world disorder”, “no one’s world”, “non-polar” or “G-Zero” world (Haass 2008; Bremmer and Roubini 2011; Bremmer 2012; Kupchan 2013; Haass 2014; Wolf 2017), the diagnoses is that we are entering an era with no one superpower or hegemon in charge of solving the world’s problems and as a result world politics risks becoming much less stable and rules-based, multilateralism and global governance will be significantly weakened, political and economic liberalization will come to a halt, and the world be less a much less safe place than in the ‘American century’. The sense of change is so profound that many do not only see current events as the long-predicted end of the “unipolar moment” and the “coming of anarchy” (Mearsheimer 1990; Krauthammer 1991; Kaplan 1994) as the long-awaited “rise of the rest” finally ushers in a “post-American world” (Khranna 2008; Mahbubani 2008; Zakaria 2008; Jacques 2012). These analyses of the consequences of a post-American and leaderless world have been floating around American foreign policy commentator for years, even decades. They have gained an unprecedented prominence in the recent year or so, however, and, as will be elaborated below, the debate has taken a different shape this time around.

The consensus in American foreign policy circles now appears to be that this is not simply the end of the ‘unipolar’ post-Cold War era but a much more fundamental break with the post-World War II international order: the decline of the so-called ‘liberal international order’ installed, maintained and led by the United States in the wake of World War II. Instead, we are entering a period where great powers turn inwards and are neither willing nor able to bear the burdens of global leadership. Even more important in shaping the sense of urgency and novelty, this change is driven by a voluntary abdication of global leadership, under the Trump presidency, rather than a hegemonic clash between rising and declining powers.

As a growing number of observers point to an ongoing break with the post-WWII international order, it has also become increasingly popular to draw analogies from the period that preceded it—the interwar period—to today’s turmoil and disorder. Analogies to the 1930s are deployed in numerous ways—economic crisis, the descent into trade wars and blocs, rising populism, nationalism and fascism, the undermining of democratic institutions, the rise of revisionist great powers, and notably the decline of the leading ‘status quo’ power and its inability, or in the contemporary case, unwillingness to provide global leadership and public goods. The latter—the potential decline of the United States from its superpower status—plays a significant role in the current American discourse on the future global leadership. As the following illustrates, the debate on power transitions, the future of global order and leadership is often a debate on America’s decline, the future of the American-led liberal international order and American leadership and soft power.

This paper is not interested in determining whether the United States is really in decline and whether there is in fact a global leadership vacuum, or not, but rather in studying the contours of this debate and its political effects. It does so by examining how American observers of international affairs have debated the question of global leadership over the recent year. I argue that diagnoses of the coming of a ‘leaderless’ or ‘G-Zero’ world are never only neutral observations of 1 Ever since the World Economic Forum started its Survey on the Global Agenda, lack of global leadership has climbed up the list of pressing global challenges. Already in the Outlook on 2015 survey, 86% of respondents agreed that there is a leadership crisis in the world. Lack of global leadership was thus identified as the third most pressing issue after deepening income inequality and jobless growth, up from 6th in the 2013 survey (World Economic Forum 2014). Given recent events, one cannot imagine that the outlook on global leadership in 2017 would look more optimistic.

---

world politics, but also political moves. The discourse on a leadership vacuum can be deployed politically to do different things, such as to call for stronger unilateral leadership, containing others’ attempts to lead or for more multilateral engagement and global governance to mention but a few. Moreover, it embodies more or less explicit notions of what (good) leadership is and it sees the world to be lead from a distinct perspective. By examining the contemporary debate on global leadership among American intellectuals and policymakers, the paper aims to shed light on the broader politics of ‘declinism’ and a ‘leaderless world’.

Methodologically, the paper does so by studying the debate on the future of global leadership in the ten largest U.S. newspapers USA Today, The Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, Los Angeles Times, New York Post, Newsday, Chicago Tribune, New York Daily News, The Washington Post and The Denver Post, as well as the influential policy magazine Foreign Affairs. These sources are selected to get an insight into the American mainstream (dare one say ‘establishment’?) discourse on global leadership. The initial search therefore focused on articles using the term ‘leadership vacuum’, ‘global leadership’ or ‘global leader(s)’ in Lexis Nexis. The search is also limited to items published in recent years (January 1, 2016 to June 2017). As will be clear below, this is not an argument that the debate on American decline and lack of global leadership is novel, but simply in order to trace the most recent shape of this otherwise longstanding discourse (and not least how contemporary observers argue that ‘this time is real’).

The Decline of America and its Liberal Order: An International Relations Classic

The anxiety about America’s decline, and its consequences for global order, governance, institutions, security, and prosperity has always had a special place in the discipline of International Relations. The debate on American decline has a long history—indeed, it can be traced all the way back to the United States’ rise to global supremacy—but it has resurfaced with particular force with the conjunction of the economic crisis and the rise of new great powers. The literature on American decline, rising powers and the future of the liberal order feeds into a long history of anxiety over potential challengers to American hegemony (USSR, Japan and now China) and an even longer one about the decline of the Western civilization (Spengler 1926; Anderson, Ikenberry, and Risse 2008). There have been waves of declinism ever since America rose to world power (Cox 2007, 2012). ‘Optimists’ or ‘denialists’ of various hues have likened declinists to boys prematurely crying wolf (Joffe 2009; Slaughter 2009; Nye 2010; Beckley 2011; Nye 2011; Drezner 2012; Kagan 2012; Lieber 2012; Nye 2012; Wohlforth 2012; Wohlforth and Brooks 2016). ‘Declinists’ admitted the déjà vu but maintained that the wolf eventually came in that story (Zakaria 2008; Bell 2010; Rachman 2010; Berman 2011; Etzioni 2011; Friedman and Mandelbaum 2011; Rachman 2011; Brzezinski 2012; Cohen 2012; Layne 2012). This spilled over into a debate about the best strategies for the United States to pursue in order to prolong its dominance in an era of decline: global engagement or retrenchment and off-shore balancing (Brooks, Ikenberry, and Wohlforth 2013; Posen 2013; Kagan 2014; Brands and Feaver 2016; Mearsheimer and Walt 2016).

Through all this, ‘revisionist’ rising great powers such as the BRICS were seen as the main threat to the so-called ‘liberal order’ designed and defended by a declining United States – a collective designation used, sometimes quite loosely, to refer to the formal and informal institutions that have produced unprecedented economic growth through free and open trade, produced security through the formation of security alliances and communities, that operates through multilateralism, international law and rules-based interactions, and has promoted democracy and human rights. The concern with rising powers, and their dissatisfaction in particular, has been underpinned by power transition theory claiming that major power war are more likely when there is 1) a power parity between established and rising power, 2) when there is high differential growth and the transition therefore is taking place in a fast pace, 3) particularly if the rising power has already overtaken the established power and 4) when the rising power is dissatisfied with the status quo order and rules installed by the established power (Organski 1968; Organski and Kugler 1980; Tammen, Kugler, Lemke, Stam, Abdollahian, Alsharabati, et al. 2000). This has led to a wealth of studies, published over the past decade or so, of the power differential between the United States and especially China, the potential sources of rising power dissatisfaction and revisionism, potential power transition scenarios and policies for handling them (Johnston 2003; Chan 2005; Tammen 2006; Tammen and Kugler 2006; Goldstein 2007; Legro 2007; Levy 2008; Feng 2009; Kastner and Saunders 2012; Rapkin and Thompson 2013; Chen and Pu 2014; Wohlfarth and Brooks 2016).

The preoccupation with the rising powers as the main challenge to America’s leadership role, and the liberal international order itself, characterized the state of debate until very recently. Indeed, some of the very earliest articles surveyed for this paper, published before the election of Donald Trump, still write into the established debate about America’s global (dis)engagement and the danger rising revisionist powers pose to the liberal international order (e.g. Daalder and Kagan 2016; Kaplan 2016; Lieberman 2016). Yet, a quite sudden shift in the American discourse on global order and leadership can be identified in the latter part of the period surveyed here. Now, it seems the main challenge to the liberal international order comes from within.

This Time is Different: From Hegemonic Contest to Abdication

A good indication that something has changed is when the author of the liberal victory march, ‘The End of History’, argues that “Today, the greatest challenge to liberal democracy comes not so much from overtly authoritarian powers such as China, as from within” (Fukuyama 2016). Much of this stems from a concern over rising domestic authoritarianism as expressed in attacks on free media, undermining the rule of law, judiciaries and permanent bureaucracies, threats to imprison opponents, the encouragement of violence and racism, praise for dictators, and so on (Mickey, Levitsky, and Ahmad Way 2017). However, in relation to global leadership and order, the topic of this special issue, the main change concerns the shift from focusing on external threats to U.S. leadership and the liberal international order towards the threats from within. China and Russia pose challenges to liberalism “but the more important threats to the order are internal”, argues Niblett, as the EU is undergoing a process of disintegration and the “U.S. commitment to global leadership, which until now has sustained the order through good times and bad, looks weaker than at any point since World War II.” (Niblett 2017). While the European part of the equation—rising populism, nationalism, xenophobia and disintegration—was seen as a challenge in the post-Brexit, pre-election period, it was not seen as a grave threat to the future liberal order and global leadership itself (see the 2016 Foreign Affairs issue on populism, for example). Post-election, however, observers overwhelmingly point to how America itself may be undermining and even voluntarily abdicating its historic leadership role in the liberal international order: The argument in mainstream foreign policy outlets is that Trump has voluntarily abdicated America’s traditional leadership role by questioning its long-standing alliances, multilateral ones like NATO and bilateral ones in Asia, or at least taking a transactional approach to them, by withdrawing from free trade arrangements, new ones like the TPP and renegotiating old ones like NAFTA, and even threatening a trade war, by tearing up the Paris climate accords as well as a the Iran nuclear deal, by replacing a tolerant and multicultural attitude to difference with a jingoistic and nationalist one, and generally by replacing a grand strategy of global engagement where America held the mantle of global leadership with an isolationist ‘America first’ doctrine focused on national gain. In the words of the president himself “I'm not, and I don't want to be, the president of the world.” (Washington Post 2017).
This change is evident from recent issues Foreign Affairs, arguably the preeminent foreign policy magazine in the United States. In issues titled “Present at the destruction” and “Out of Order”, previous defenders of the liberal order, like Robert Keohane and John Ikenberry, emphasize how the rise of populism in the wake of the economic crisis means that the UK and US have turned their back on multilateralism and international ‘engagement’ more broadly (Colgan and Keohane 2017; Ikenberry 2017; Nye Jr 2017). Ikenberry exemplifies the astonishment over the fact that the prevailing order would come under pressure from within rather than the outside:

“Is the world witnessing the demise of the U.S.-led liberal order? If so, this is not how it was supposed to happen. The great threats were supposed to come from hostile revisionist powers seeking to overturn the postwar order. The United States and Europe were supposed to stand shoulder to shoulder to protect the gains reaped from 70 years of cooperation. Instead, the world’s most powerful state has begun to sabotage the order it created. A hostile revisionist power has indeed arrived on the scene, but it sits in the Oval Office, the beating heart of the free world.” (Ikenberry 2017:2).

Global orders come and go, Ikenberry notes, but what is new – and surprising – is that such order most often end in “murder” of their sponsors rather than in hegemonic “suicide” (Ikenberry 2017:2). Contrary to academic expectations, as well as those prevailing in the wider foreign policy community, Trump has “abandoned” responsibility for leading the world “America made” (Ikenberry 2017:3). “America’s postwar global leadership”, Susan Rice, the former National Security Advisor, argues “was not taken from us by any adversary, nor lost as a result of economic crisis or collapse of empire. America voluntarily gave up that leadership -- because we quit the field.” Even Graham Allison, who popularized the idea of a Thucydides’ Trap in which a rising China and declining United States would inevitably clash over global leadership recently argued that “we are absenting the field” (cited in Sanger and Perlez 2017). Or as Ratner argues within a regional context, “U.S. regional leadership [in Asia] is much more likely to go out with a whimper than with a bang.” (Ratner 2017). What is interesting about the shift in the diagnosis is also the policy prescriptions it opens up. As the diagnosis shifts from the main threat to the United States’ global position being great power war between competing hegemons as envisioned by the “Thucydides’ Trap” to hegemonic suicide, the prescriptions also becomes less about caution, restraint, de-escalation and reassurance that aims integrate and ‘satisfy’ rising powers than about ‘daring to act’, deter and reassert America’s historic leadership—and often contain Chinese leadership in the process (Ratner 2017).

The Dangers of a Leadership Vacuum: From Thucydides’ to Kindleberger’s Trap

This signals somewhat of a departure in the academic literature on global order and leadership: The greatest danger in contemporary international affairs is therefore not the power transition between the US and China in itself, but that this transition and other forces have left us in a situation with ‘no one in charge’: a global “leadership deficit” (Lehmann 2016). America’s abdication and the resulting lack of global public goods provision, Joseph Nye argues, “is why the most important challenge to the provision of world order in the twenty-first century comes not from without but from within.” (Nye 2017). He therefore argues that we should not fear a ‘Thucydides Trap’ as much as a ‘Kindleberger Trap’: namely, that we should not only be concerned about an inevitable clash between United States and China (like Britain and Germany around the World Wars), with the latter challenging the order installed by the former, as a product of the power transition. Rather, we should fear a situation where the inability of the existing great power (Britain then, the United States today) to support the order it had built results in a leadership vacuum that produces disasters like in the 1930s. According to this logic, consistent with Kindleberger’s hegemonic stability theory, the rules and norms of a given order are not self-enforcing but need a state hegemon to support – and preferably abide by – them (Mazarr 2017).

Leadership, in this view, is defined as system stewardship: the sacrifice of short-term national interest for the greater sake of maintaining the status quo order, rules and institutions; the provision of public goods that benefit all, not just the steward. The United States was seen as a leader when it “stood for more than just its own well-being and that the world economy was not a zero-sum game.” (Patrick 2017). “Leadership is not the same as domination”, as Nye emphasizes (Nye Jr 2017). Other observers of international relations have also emphasized the lack of global leadership along similar lines of the ‘Kindleberger Trap’. Ian Bremmer of the Eurasia Group, for example, has long been arguing that “the world lacks leadership” and that “a G-zero world is now fully upon us.” (Bremmer 2015). In his view “the biggest structural risk is the lack of global governance” and that this is only produced in part by the United States. A “G-Zero world” is not equivalent to, or produced solely by, America’s decline: “American capacity and willingness to provide global leadership certainly is much less than it was. Perhaps more importantly, no one else individually and no constellation of powers are prepared to step up and fill even a portion of that role, and so what we have is an absence of global leadership, and this is what I’ve been talking about: the G-zero.” (Grundlgeger and Creehan 2012).

The fear of weak American leadership, if not its complete abdication from global leadership, also has a history. Critics of President Obama, for example, see a longstanding US leadership vacuum dating at least to his administration. Particularly, its red line and subsequent decision not to intervene in Syria is seen as a “lack of public global leadership” (Kristof 2016). Critics of Obama have therefore long argued that “the world has never seemed as dangerous and leaderless as it does now” and that “The absence of American leadership has certainly not caused all the instability, but it has encouraged and exacerbated it.” (Lieberman 2016). Obama’s “Leading from behind” and “lack of leadership” in the Middle East is similarly criticized for allowing other powers like Russia and Iran to fill the vacuum (Thornberry and Krepinevich 2016). By contrast, Trump’s immediate response to a gas attack was seen as a potential step to “fill the leadership vacuum” (Washington Post 2017). Some even go so far as to argue that Trump does not signal the end of U.S. leadership but rather a “disruptive change” that will “revitalize” the “crumbling international order” and “world in disarray” left behind by the Obama administration (Kroenig 2017). The particular case of the Syria strike is often singled out as an example of “American moral leadership” because it was not undertaken for direct national gain (except perhaps to impress president Xi) but served to enforce norms on weapons of mass destruction on behalf of the international community (Abrams 2017; Haass 2017). Nevertheless, it is quite telling of the way global leadership is conceived, by some observers, that Trump is seen as most presidential and taking on the traditional mantle of global leadership only when he sent 59 cruise missiles into Syria—while having dinner with Xi Jinping. Global leadership is conceived as taking action, not necessarily in order to solve global problems but to at least “do something”. The power vacuum is used in this regard to justify engagement and intervention, unilateral if necessary.²

² This is not limited to the U.S. discourse. For instance, one can also find calls for Britain to fill the vacuum in the Middle East. “There is a global leadership vacuum which the UK can and must step in to fill – even more urgently following the referendum, to counter any idea of our "strategic shrinkage" from the world.” And “Down the ages, Britain has been a beacon for liberal values and humanitarianism. In these desperate times, the lives of terrorised people of Aleppo depend on international leaders finding the courage to act.” (Mitchell 2016).
The idea of a power void or vacuum, which pervades many of the articles surveyed here, is an interesting but often unquestioned spatial metaphor. The basic idea is that the international consists of void spaces that must be filled by someone. As the United States abdicates, it leaves behind completely empty spaces around the world. Assuming that no one else already occupied this space, the expectation is that someone will enter to fill the vacuum.

Vacuums Tend to Fill: Containing Aspiring Leaders

What is interesting is not only the different diagnoses of the problem of a leadership ‘vacuum’ or ‘void’, but how it is used to put forward certain political solutions as a response. Here, two tendencies are striking: the mainstream U.S. discourse on the coming ‘leadership vacuum’ is not primarily about the global governance problems left unsolved as the U.S. abdicates its leadership role (i.e. climate change, civil wars, trade barriers, laggard economic growth, rising authoritarianism, terrorism and so on) but rather about the damage it does to U.S. power, influence, credibility and image around the world and the fact that other great powers might take over its historic leadership role.

One of the most common questions asked following the ‘leadership vacuum’ diagnosis is who will step into the void left by the United States. Prior to the election of Trump, this rhetorical figure could take the shape of countering China by taking on economic leadership in the Asia-Pacific or Russia and Iran’s exploitation of a geopolitical leadership vacuum in Eastern Europe and the Middle East by having the United States “reassert its historic leadership role” because “today’s morass is in part the consequence of a leadership vacuum.” (Kasich 2016; Lieberman 2016; Washington Post 2016b). Post-Trump when the likelihood of a US reasserting its global leadership role seems diminished, defenders of the liberal order still point to the dangers of China, Russia and Iran filling the vacuum. Warning that an isolationist ‘America First’, may in fact result in putting ‘China First’ as the global leader. In that sense, the discourse on the decline of American and the liberal order is still very intertwined with that on the rise of China.

Much of the discourse surrounding potential global leaders filling the “void” and “exploit the leadership vacuum” after the American abdication concentrates on China (Sanger and Perlez 2017; Zakaria 2017). Xi Jinping’s speech at the World Economic Forum in Davos—whose theme was “responsive and responsible leadership”—features in most sources as a central turning point in asserting China’s commitment to free trade, economic cooperation, stewardship, and a global leadership role after the U.S. abdication (Ehrenfreund 2017; Nakamura 2017; Wong 2017b). Trade and investment initiatives like the One Belt, One Road project, the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank, the New Development Bank and Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership are also frequently mentioned as indications of China’s assertion of global, or at least regional, leadership, particularly after the US withdrawal from the Trans-Pacific Partnership (Tweed and Olorunnipa 2016; Fidler 2017; Perlez and Buckley 2017). In terms of economic leadership in Asia, in particular, Trump’s withdrawal from the TPP is viewed as a “big win” for China that “created a void that President Xi was already practicing to fill.” (Perlez and Buckley 2017) and allowed China to roll out a “more audacious version of the Marshall Plan” (Perlez and Huang 2017). Chinese and European alignment on trade and climate change is also covered with some alarm, arguing for instance that “America's traditional allies are on the lookout for new friends…[and that] Many are looking to China, which adroitly capitalized on a leadership vacuum.” (Goodman 2017).

John Ikenberry also laments the fact that China “has already begun to step into the geopolitical vacuum Trump is creating.” (Ikenberry 2017:4). Pointing to the Davos speech in terms of economic leadership, the defense of free trade and investment, this is somewhat paradoxical considering that Ikenberry foresaw this outcome: that rising powers would see that they benefit from an open, rules-based order and thus overtake it when they become more powerful than the Western powers that installed it (Ikenberry 2008). More in line with Ikenberry’s original arguments, others have argued that China “understands and appreciates the order more than is commonly realized.” (Nye 2017). Others, in turn, have been more skeptical that China will be capable, and even willing, to bear the burdens of global leadership and to provide global public goods, at least beyond the economic sphere where it benefits China’s own national interest in economic growth and national rejuvenation (Hu and Spence 2017). And not in stopping ISIS, stabilizing the Middle East, mitigating climate change, containing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and so on (Bremmer 2015). Regardless, Chinese leadership is rarely welcomed in the elite U.S. discourse.

Particularly, President Trump’s announcement in early June 2017 that the US will withdraw from the Paris climate accord has been widely viewed as creating “a vacuum of global leadership that presents ripe opportunities to allies and adversaries alike to reorder the world's power structure…the greatest strategic gift to the Chinese, who are eager to fill the void that Washington is leaving around the world” (Sanger and Perlez 2017). The withdrawal was widely interpreted as an “abdication” that “ceded” global leadership to China and an important opportunity for China to boost its soft power, even if there is also some questioning whether China is willing to take on the role as a global leader in fighting climate change (Deese 2017; Kaiman and Zavis 2017; Krupp 2017; Morello and Wagner 2017; Shao 2017; Wong 2017a). Retreat from leadership on climate change is seen as particularly damaging because it is high consensus issue supported by a broad coalition of states, including U.S. allies which reaffirmed their commitment immediately afterwards, thus damaging U.S. “soft power”, credibility and ability to build coalitions on other issues (Deese 2017; Morello and Wagner 2017). Conversely when it comes to Chinese leadership, the fear is not that China will take responsibility on climate change per se, but that in so doing it will exploit the tensions between the United States and Europe to forge new partnerships, if not alliances (Sanger and Perlez 2017). Richard Haass of the Council of Foreign Relations, arguing that Trump has “certainly made the world safe for Chinese influence” (Sanger and Perlez 2017). Trump “has wreaked havoc”, Susan Rice argued, "hobbling our core alliances, jettisoning American values and abdicating United States leadership of the world. That's a whole lot of winning -- for Russia and China." (Rice 2017).

Liberal Leadership and American Exceptionalism

Key to understanding the resistance to Chinese global leadership among U.S. foreign policy commentators is that the current leadership vacuum is often conceived as a liberal leadership vacuum. One element of liberal leadership has to do with stewardship over the institutions, rules and norms of the liberal international order. China could in principle take leadership over some of these institutions, however, so the notion of liberal leadership runs deeper than that. It also implies liberalism conceived as global leaders that are politically liberal, democratic, respect human rights and the rule of law. In which case China falls short: “The leader of an open system must itself be open” (Kausikan 2017). This definition of leadership ties into the American exceptionalist discourse of being not just a leader, but “Leader of the Free World” (Applebaum 2016; Kasich 2016).

Several other observers stress the exceptionalism of America’s leadership role, arguing that “The idea of America has been at the heart of our success in the world for 70 years. For all our imperfections, we have embodied political and economic openness, respect for human dignity and a sense of possibility.” (Burns 2017). The “power of our example” and commitment to “what is best in us” means that “no country is better positioned than the United States to lead in the twenty-first century”, argues Joe Biden, as he warns against turning inwards (Biden 2016). Arguments based on American exceptionalism tend to follow a particular logic in which only America can lead in this particular manner, thus portraying a world without American leadership as a disaster for the entire globe. This type of analysis lends itself mostly to a political call for reinvigorating American ideas, values, soft power and diplomacy—the solution is more America: “At a moment when the international order is under severe strain, power is fragmenting and great-power rivalry has returned, the values and purpose at the core of the American idea matter more than ever.” (Burns 2017). Without American leadership, as a Washington Post editorial puts it, the “world would become a much colder - and more dangerous - place.” (Washington Post 2016a). The solution, John Kasich argues another piece, is to “send a message to the world that we are the global leader, today and forever.” (Kasich 2016). Global leadership, in this conception, is not only about solving global problems in, say, trade or climate change, but it is equally important who solves these problems and how. America is “indispensable” (Kausikan 2017).

The call for liberal, and not just any kind of, leadership does lead some to put their faith in Japan and Germany to “step up” as the only credible liberal alternatives (Ikenberry 2017:3) and in some cases Canada under Trudeau and France under Macron (New York Times 2017). As “Trump is abdicating all moral power”, according to this line of argument, “The world has no choice but to move on.” (Robinson 2017). Angela Merkel’s beer hall speech after the G-7 meeting in May 2017 calling for Europeans to take their fate in their own hands and not rely completely on others in doing so is also read as a step in this direction. Overall, however, it is remarkable how few U.S. foreign policy commentators put their faith in European allies to provide global leadership. Many are pessimistic about Europe’s ability, not willingness, to be a global leader (Bremmer 2015).

Finally, it is quite striking how few commentators use the ‘leadership vacuum’ diagnosis to encourage more global governance, a strengthening of multilateral, institutionalized and collective leadership. Global leadership is mainly conceived in state- and U.S.-centric terms. Some scholars do use of the decline and leadership vacuum narrative to call for reform of the liberal order, however. That is, a call to reform the declining order in order to preserve, adapt and renovate it, as opposed to tearing it down (Haass 2017). Proposals for reform take two main forms. One concerns the (liberal) values and norms underpinning the order and the other concerns its inclusivity and stewards. As for the former, some suggest reforming the liberal order by making it benefit more people so as to defuse populist sentiments (Hu and Spence 2017). To defenders of the liberal order everyone loses if the order erodes (or more people stand to lose than win (Ikenberry 2017:8)), but they also acknowledge that the order has benefitted the few. To put it in Ruggie’s famous term, it has lost its embeddedness and is now mostly (neo)liberal.3 So there are some calls from reform, a ‘derigging’ of liberal order, primarily by softening its economic liberalism, to benefit people more broadly (Colgan and Keohane 2017). As for the latter, a few observers suggest global governance reform in the sense of giving rising powers a greater stake. In this view, one of the main threats to the liberal order, apart from rising populism and nationalism in the West, is that rising powers like the BRICS have greater ambitions but feel disenfranchised by the order. The proposal here is to build a more diverse and inclusive order by making “accommodations to enfranchise non-Western powers while upholding the essential rules of an open trading system.” (Mazarr 2017; see also Feigenbaum 2017). Reform by inclusion remains a minority view, however, especially after the election of President Trump.

Conclusion

The future of America’s global leadership and the so-called American-led liberal order has become the most central question to American foreign policy commentators after the election of President

---

3 Both Ikenberry 2017, Colgan and Keohane 2017 quote Ruggie.
Trump. This paper has examined this American discourse on global leadership in order to shed light on the politics of ‘declinism’ and a ‘leaderless world’. It founds that the foreign policy establishment is struggling, in particular, with the fact that America seems to be abdicating this role voluntarily. Only some years ago, few would suggest that the challenge to the liberal international order would come from home. Instead, most of the attention was directed towards rising revisionist powers and the threat they posed to the liberal order. Although America’s own abdication is seen as a major source of instability and disorder, this paper nonetheless finds a corollary anxiety is about the threat of China ‘stepping into void’. The narrative of a leadership vacuum is most deployed to call for stronger unilateral leadership and containing aspiring leaders while voices calling for more multilateral engagement and reform of global governance are few and far between. The paper examined only the outlets associated with the foreign policy establishment and rather than a debate proper it found an almost consensus anxiety about the future of the liberal international order and America’s role in it. While Trump and Trumpism might turn out to be an aberration, it is worth noting that the American foreign policy establishment seems more disconnected from the kitchens of power than ever. While the theory-policy gap in American IR has long been lamented (George 1993; Nye 2008; Jentleson and Ratner 2011), the current disconnect has a much more fundamental character. And perhaps critical scholars also need to revise the notion of the power-knowledge nexus and the ‘revolving door’ that has long been used to characterize American IR (Hoffmann 1977; Smith 2002).

This paper has looked only at the American side of the story, it is worth noting that the Chinese foreign policy establishment is also experiencing a debate over whether China should assume more global leadership and how. Traditionally reluctant to present itself as a global leader, and especially one that overtakes leadership from the United States, China’s intellectuals and policymakers have nevertheless started debating their country’s potential leadership role after America’s abdication (particularly after Xi Jinping’s Davos Speech, see (Chen 2017)). While there is not space to go into Chinese debates on global leadership here—a topic that is also touched upon by other contributions to this special issue—it is not unlikely that a study of how Chinese foreign policy commentators and policymakers approach to the current ‘leadership deficit’ would have many resemblances to that of the United States. The discourse on a leadership vacuum and world disorder can also be deployed to call for Chinese leadership. To argue that Chinese leadership is, by definition, better, more benevolent, humane and moral leadership (Yan 2011a, 2011b, 2016). That in a disorderly world, more China would be a source of order and harmony (Zhao 2009). That China is an exceptional country (Callahan 2012; Zhang 2013). In contrast to the American debate, however, Chinese leaders have only shown willingness to lead in selective areas, not to impose and uphold a comprehensive global order. The discourse on Chinese leadership is therefore likely to focus more on global governance issues of immediate benefit to China and its economic and social development (trade, investment, climate and the environment) but not on others (Syria, terrorism, civil war). The real test for Chinese leadership will be when the world expects China to ‘do something’ about children being gassed or journalist being decapitated on Youtube. Even China may then be regretting America’s abdication.

Bibliography

Spengler, Oswald. (1926) The Decline of the West [1918]. Translated by Charles Francis Atkinson. A.A Knopf.

